

Being in a relationship with someone from a different culture can be great if you don't try to convert the other person away from the way they were brought up. If they do it of their own free will, that's fine but don't try to get them to be like you. Use the best parts of both your cultures. You're different but equal. Respect your partner's differences. Learn some of his culture, religion and language. Disregard societal hang-ups. Practice both cultures in the home. If we were to get rid of all our preconceived notions about how we ought to treat interfaith and interracial couples and just got along with our lives as pure beings as is without the covering that is race or religion, we'd get along a lot better than obsessing over it. The fact is that people with spiritual values and people who share the same spiritual views are generally happier as a couple than are other couples. Shared spirituality is one thing but spirituality with two people from different faiths may be a problem especially if one or both are zealots. If you're like this, a zealot, do yourself a favor and marry someone of your own faith. The bottom line is that a couple who believes in something greater than themselves will often have a more stable relationship than secular couples. You might think that in the modern civilized world, mixed marriages are fine but prejudice is alive and well albeit mostly hidden from public view so know that if you fall in love with somebody of another race or religion, you might get prejudice from society at large. The most immediate problem is relatives and close friends, generally the older the person the more close-minded they are to the interracial or interfaith marriage but this rule is not laid in stone. Some old folks are pretty cool and conversely some young people are pretty close-minded about their brother or sister marrying someone of another race. The best solution is to go talk to them face to face to let them see the real flesh and blood you. The bottom line with family and friends is that when you marry, all allegiances fall by the wayside to the allegiance to your spouse. Respect them but if they try to stand between you and your spouse and try to make you feel guilty, drop them. When you marry, your spouse becomes your main priority. Other than that, make sure you're doing it for love not just for the novelty of being with someone of another race, for the rebelliousness of it nor for the shock value, to shock your fuddy duddy parents by using your new beau to get back at them for being so narrow-minded while they were raising you. One white guy married a Hispanic lower class girl because he wanted a more Down-to-Earth lifestyle but quickly found out she hated her upbringing, wanted to move up into a white, suburban type existence so they were both left resentful of each other. Some guys marry exotic girls because of fantasies they have, some girls marry tall dark guys because of fantasies they have but don't realize these are real live human beings with major cultural differences among them, sometimes too major to make for a good longterm relationship. On some level, we all live on stereotypes. We think all black guys are studs while Asian women are humble and sexy. If you marry someone because of a stereotypical idea you have, you could be in trouble. All Jewish guys are spoiled to be rich, Asian guys loyal providers but if you don't match this stereotype to your partner who expected it, the relationship is screwed. You might think Filipino girls are exotic but then when you meet a couple in real life, they might be just like any other westernized, capitalist girl around. People of one group may dislike the opposite sex people in their group like the black guy I saw on TV who said he couldn't stand black women because they talked too loud and too much or the Chinese chick who said all Chinese guys were skinny nerds.
